Marketing on a Dime

Complete article available at www.nahb.org

With all the tasks that owners of small home building companies juggle, it can be hard to find time for marketing. But it pays to squeeze it in anyway.

Make the most of signage. Since jobsite signage is your calling card, make sure you have a well-built, well-designed sign that makes your company stand out from others. Pay attention to where you post it. And be sure your company name, phone number, and Web site address are readable from the curb.

It's recommended that you try the "six year old" test on your company's website. If a six year old can use the site effectively, then any client can.

Another marketing tip would be to rethink your business card. Some businesses have their cards in an actual postcard size containing information from previous ads ran and photos of their company's projects. These businesses have found that the postcards have a shelf life of about three years. If you give people a pretty picture, they will tape it up and keep it longer. If you give them an ordinary business card, they may be more apt to throw it away.

Another great way to get information to the public is through an updated website. Maybe you've got a website already but aren't getting enough traffic on it. It may be too complex. Prospects find it hard to wade through sites that contain too much text or lack navigation bars. If that's the case, they may pass on your website because it's too time consuming to search through.

It's recommended that you try the "six-year-old" test on your companies website. If a six year old can use your site effectively, then any client can.

To make your site more user-friendly try adding such things as a navigation bar (or basic menu), Contact Us button or a photo gallery of your past projects.
